Writer and historian Adrian Tinniswood pieces together the human story of the Fire and its aftermath, providing a reconstruction of what happened to schoolchildren, and servants, courtiers and clergymen.

The Great Fire wasn't simply a tragedy of economics and architecture, some 436 acres of closely packed streets burned, 13,200 houses destroyed, millions of pounds lost; it also killed and maimed, and it drove Londoners mad in their quest for vengeance.

Tinniswood, a seasoned lecturer and broadcaster, explores the history of a cataclysm and its consequences from the first small blaze to the rebirth of the City.

Paul Finch, editorial director of Architects' Journal, will introduce The Wren Talk which takes place as part of the London Festival of Architecture.
